Artillery Unit Locations, Early 20th Century And Artillery Badges from that Time

The army began issue of individually marked first class gunner's badges in 1903 and concluded issue of marked badges in 1913. The US Army stamped the back of each first class gunner's badge with the unit designation and the soldier's company/battery number. While these badges are well known in the US collecting community, there is little readily available information regarding the units marked on the badges. The purpose of this article is to provide data so collectors can use the back-marks to identify the location of units and through this, perhaps gain additional insight about the badge winner. Each company's muster roll, typically completed every other month, includes when a soldier received his badge. This article also provides data showing the various designations of artillery units from 1899 until the 1916 army expansion.

Unlike the early unmarked artillery badges, when a soldier won one of the 1903 badges shown at the right, Rock Island Arsenal stamped the reverse of the top bar with two rows: the first line had the unit designation and either "COAST ART" or "FIELD ART" and the second line had the soldier's number. This number was assigned by each company sized unit and identified a soldier's equipment and other personal property. An example is shown below and is a typical reverse. Rock Island Arsenal marked the first line with the unit designation, in this case 105 CO

unit number: No. 1. Table II shows the 105th Company was stationed at the Presidio of San Francisco, California, after being authorized in 1901.

Between 1899 and 1907 the army reorganized and expanded the artillery several times. Frequent designation changes accompanied unit transfers caused by the Philippine Insurrection, the turmoil in the Caribbean, and consolidation at larger posts.

The 1901 artillery reorganization did away with the old artillery regimental organization. A coast artillery unit became "company" and a field artillery unit a "battery." The army then numbered each coast artillery company separately, one through 126 (later expanded to 170 companies in 1907). At the same time the army numbered each field artillery battery 1 through 30. This defined, for example, the "7th Artillery Company" as coastal artillery, and the "7th Artillery Battery" as field artillery.

Table I lists company numbered 1 through 82, their earlier designations, and locations through mid 1909. Some locations are only by state rather than a specific fort, as some army documentation used to compile the list had only the state listed. The pre-1901 designation is included to help track companies to previous historical units.

The army suspended issue and wear of the coast artillery style first class gunner badges in 1909, but two years previous the army organized coast artillery companies 127 through 170. Members of these new organizations had only two years to earn these badges, so badges from these high numbered units are scarce. Tables I through III show unit locations.

The US Army artillery branch has an interesting history as regiments came and went. For a short time after the Spanish-American War artillery regiments had both "N" and "O" batteries since regiments had 14 company-sized units, as will be seen in Table I.

Table I. Coast artillery companies 1 through 82 including locations through July 1909.

The US Army stationed heavy artillery units at various coastal locations and about the time of the Spanish-American War started to name each new concrete gun emplacement after a military person, such as Battery Lee. The army constructed Battery Lee at Marrowstone Island, Washington, between August 1899 and November 1900. At its establishment the emplacement mounted two 5-inch guns. Battery Lee was named in honor of Corps of Engineers Lieutenant Walter Hatch Lee, who was killed in action at Lipa, Luzon, Philippines Islands, on June 10, 1901. Battery Wilhelm was named for Captain William H. Wilhelm (21st Infantry) who died of wound in the same action as Lieutenant Lee. These two batteries initially comprised Fort Flagler, Washington, although later the army added other batteries to the emplacement that helped guard Seattle.

With some research in War Department General Orders a student can determine which numbered coast artillery companies occupied the named batteries. As shown above, initially the 26th and 94th Companies occupied Ft. Flagler and later the 106th Company came as the army added more gun emplacements. War Department General Order 25, 1901, assigned Captain Eugene Wilson as commander, 94th Company and 2d Lieutenant Raymond Pratt as the other officer, the army not having enough artillery 1st lieutenants. This same order provides that half of the men in the 26th Company (already at Ft. Flagler) be assigned to the 94th Company to initially man the unit until more recruits could be found.

Initially the army allowed field artillery soldiers to earn the coast artillery looking first class gunner's badges, but field artillery soldiers complained and soon the army provided a test tailored to field artillery and distinctive field artillery badges. The photo below shows the 16th Battery, a siege unit, at Fort Leavenworth on November 18, 1903.

Some of the enlisted men from the 16th Siege Battery stand on their barracks steps in about 1904 or so, include with one man in the third row wearing the coast artillery style badge. He was certainly one of the earliest field artillery badge awardees. A close up of his is next. The corporal on the end of the second row wears his large pre 1902 chevrons point up, as was common at this time. The photo is from the Frontier Army Museum, Fort Leavenworth.

Field artillery style first class gunners' badges showing a field gun in profile. Unlike the coast artillery badge demise in 1909, this style badge lasted until 1913. Table IV gives the unit location for field artillery batteries until July 1909. Movements after mid 1909 are listed in Table V.

September 1904 saw the army form to four batteries into battalions of field artillery. Shortly thereafter the army made provisional field artillery regiments: the first provisional regiment was soon followed by others. Again the US Army reorganized and expanded the field artillery in mid-1907, this time under Congressional authorization that provides the roots for the current Field Artillery regiments. Each new artillery regiment contained two battalions, with a battalion consisting of three batteries, no doubt based upon the experimental work done in 1905 and 1906.

Rock Island Arsenal marked the reverse of these new-style field artillery badges: in 1905 through early 1907 with the battery number and after the July 1907 reorganization, with the regiment and battery letter. The provisional battalion and regiment marks never showed up-Rock Island always used the permanent unit designations. The badge shown above is the reverse of a 1904-1907 field artillery badge with the top line marked

29 BATTERY and the lower line FIELD ART NO 107. This last marking (NO 107) was the man's unit number. The soldier who earned this was stationed at Ft. Leavenworth, as shown in Table IV.

At the right is the reverse of a 1907-1913 field artillery badge. The 1907 organizational change is apparent as it shows both battery and regiment. Since it is marked B BATTERY and 3 FIELD ART, the badge was worn by a soldier at Fort Sam Houston.

It is hoped that this data will allow collectors to learn more about specific first class gunner badges. Obviously badges from the Second Artillery Regiment, Batteries C, D, E, and F; and Fourth Regiment, Batteries E and F, had to be awarded only between 1907 and 1913. Likewise badges from the 8, 13, 23, 24, and 27 batteries will be scarce since these units served in the Philippines, while batteries 17 and 18 were in Cuba. The 6th Regiment spent its entire time at Ft. Riley, Kansas, and since that was a school post these badges may be more common than others.
